

A beaver with long, white whiskers and wet, brown fur stands in a river. It is looking upwards and to the left. Behind it is a large, moss-covered log that has partially submerged in the water. The water is calm and reflects the surrounding environment.

The otter makes a home, called a holt, in a hole along the riverbank.

A holt has lots of entrances. One of these entrances is usually underwater. It helps to keep predators away.

A hole among tree roots makes a perfect holt.